

Abstract:

A resettable switch has a light emitting diode in parallel connection therewith such that when the resettable switch is in a tripped condition, the resulting voltage drop across the LED causes a sufficient flow of current therein to illuminate the LED. A diode and resistor are placed in serial connection with said LED in order to protect the LED from excessive voltage and current.